The present invention relates to a connecting device for optical fibers. Optical fibers are often used for light transmission over long distances, and are typically connected using a connecting device such as a splice or a connector. However, there are several difficulties associated with connecting optical fibers using a connecting device. For example, the optical fibers must be carefully cleaved along their axes such that the end faces are perpendicular to the axes, and that they are symmetrical. Further, it is important that the two optical fibers which are to be connected be correctly aligned and positioned such that an optically compatible relationship is maintained. Additionally, the length of the optical fibers being joined to each other must be precisely controlled and known so as to ensure an acceptable distance between the end faces of the two fibers being connected. Achieving the above-described requirements for connecting optical fibers can be particularly difficult when connecting optical fibers in an underwater environment. The present invention is directed to overcoming, or at least reducing the effects of, one or more of the problems set forth above. To call the border wall "immoral" is an understatement of epic, almost seismic proportions. It's "an act of egregious treachery." It's "treasonous, even sociopathic." It's "ignorant, cruel, heartless, reprehensible, and wrong." It's "mean-spirited." It's "an affront to humanity, decency, truth, and basic human decency." Here are some words for border officers, U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials: Maybe it isn't your fault. Maybe it's a crime. And
